I. Introduction

Property is only a foundation of expectation—the expectation of deriving certain advantages from the thing said to be possessed, in consequence of the relations in which one already stands to it. But it is only due to the promise of the law one can enjoy what he has founded, which he regards as his own. Without the law there cannot be property, you remove the law and all property would come to an end. Thus it is cleared that law is an instrument with the help of which property rights is exercised.

Here in this article authors have attempting to explain how the law tries to address this appeal. Here we are concerned to the empowerment of women through property rights. The question of property rights is essentially related to law. There may be varieties of law touching different aspects of property. But all are not entertainable. Only those laws which have direct bearing with the empowerment of women's right to property are the subject matter of this article. Law concerning the women's empowerment through property rights may have different aspects. One aspect is transfer
